For men who want to keep their hair clean and arranged when exhibiting their fashion-forward style, the biggest trend is braiding. The idea of men wearing braids is an age-old style. Even our first U.S. president often wore his hair pulled back into a braid. Today, men with long hair can tame their curls, and men with short hair can have the braids they want. The possibilities are limitless. This advanced version of a human makeover keeps your hair in complete control. With the layers shaved tightly, the top layers of braids are pulled back easily into a low casual bun. It requires the skill of a professional stylist, both to provide accurate upholstery or shaving and create all free hanging braids. If your hair is too short, there are many colors and styles of knitted extensions available. This knitted style allows you to show your professional side during the day, but pack a solid fashion punch on nights out. For braids that are versatile and easy to use, it's a great long-lasting style to try. PDerrett/Getty ImagesThick is a classic but distinctly modern, knitted look for men. With a wild weight box braid extension, each person is sure to turn heads. This is another hairstyle that takes a long time to achieve. You should have someone who has experience in adding hair extensions in charge so it has a professional look. An extension like this can take four to six weeks, with due care. It is easy to limit these braids for activities or work. Just gather some or all of the braids back into a makeover bun or ponytail if needed, and keep your style fresh for weeks to come. Lorado/Getty ImagesTraditionally, corn horns use small locks of hair. But with the help of larger parts of the hair, you can create a different look that works for many types of hair. Like classic corn horns, hair is knitted very close to the scalp and moves from the forehead to the base of the skull. After that, braids hang for free. They are secured at the end of each braid. This is a look that works for shorter hairstyles, too. Braids won't hang so far from the scalp, but the dynamic pattern is just as appealing. This is a sight takes less time than classic corn horns, because there are fewer braids. You may be able to achieve this view at home with the help of a friend. anilbolukbas/Getty ImagesEba short hairstyles can rock some trendy braids! With a layer after layer of small braids, this look is easy to maintain and generally lasts a long time. This is good because you will need the services of a good hairdresser to achieve it. With this style, thin braids fill the entire scalp. They tend to get up and out around the top head, adding the addition of texture and movement on the look. Braids at the bottom of the head hang down freely, creating a loose, but restrained, statement of bold hair fashion. shironosov/Getty ImagesWhat could be easier for a braid beginner than one knit? With its simple, bold braid beginning at the base of the skull, this braid keeps even the thickest hair under control. Start by saying goodbye to your hair down the middle. Then gather three equally divided parts of the hair and create a simple box braid. For this style you need very little experience with braiding. To get the most out of this style, make sure your part is defined and the parts of your hair are the same. It makes the look sophisticated and sharp, perfect for the office or after hours. Hemera Technologies/Getty ImagesIf you think braids can't be manly, check out the male Viking braid. Another single braid, this look is anything but ordinary. While the traditional individual knitting begins at the bottom of the head, this twist begins with the forehead. Collecting all the hair together in a thick French braid and working it back, every bit of loose hair is wadded together. When the back of the head is finished, the braid continues, hanging neatly in the center of the shoulder blades. What makes this French braid so manly is a near undermining. Some men prefer to shave that part completely, but if it's too heavy for the office, leave a little hair to cover. AleksandarGeorgiev/Getty ImagesCornrows offer great versatility. In this style, the hair is knitted vertically over the head instead of from the forehead to the neck. Between straight rows, geometric patterns are formed braids, for a dramatic appearance. Fun and artistic in its design, this hairstyle has endless possibilities. A trained professional can work different designs through the scalp with this technique, give you an endless look from one technique. It will take the skill of a stylist, to create perfectly shaped patterns that are made to impress. With proper care, this style can take several weeks. It will take a long time to complete, even with the professional in charge. But the dramatic results will be worth it. These are the corn horns we are used to, with their bold lines weaving on the back of the head with precision. As braids leave their heads, they hang down and are tied to the ends. If the hair is short, braids will curl slightly, maintaining a very elegant look. This is not the most difficult style to master, but it must be done exactly for the correct visual effect. Parts of hair must be the same in order to form braids of the same size. The gaps between braids must be the same, as well, or knitted lines will look uneven. It takes quite a while to make corn hair, and the longer the hair is, the longer it will last. But once the look is achieved, it can take a long time.adamkaz/Getty ImagesIf you like hair extensions, but you need a look that will be good for the job, leaving a ponytail out of your head box braids can be perfect. You can wear a professional knitted look without cutting off all hair. Once you have your extensions added, just gather those braids into a high ponytail and crown. It gives you an orderly look that keeps your hair off your face throughout the day. And when you're ready to party, just lose your hair tie and let it all hang up. Cop you can reach at home. However, the extension takes a long time. They need to look good for experience. Ranta Pictures/Getty Images10. Color braid ExtensionSuch as you want long braids or short, it may not be boring. Wake up your style with a splash of colorful extensions for an unforgettable look, day or night. Changing the color automatically refreshes your musty appearance. Not only for women, these colorful accessories tell the world that you are a man who lives by your rules. Choose natural-looking colors, or let your wild side take control with bold shades, such as red extensions. electravk/Getty Images
